

Average Golfer with a Twist

The rich and famous aren't the only ones playing golf these days. Two year olds play, ten year olds play, twenty years olds play, and 100 year olds play. This game that teaches life lessons, self-confidence, and fosters self esteem is infiltrating all walks of life and is enticing the average person to join in the game of life. And amputees are no exception.

Andy Gardiner is just one inspirational example of an average golfer turned pro with a twist. Andy lost his leg and thanks to a friend who challenged him "To try to hit an annoying small white ball with a blooming stick" is now a professional golfer thanks to the help of his "Team Monk.": Andy refers to his "Team Monk" as the people with "Forward thinking and belief that disabled golfers are golfers like everyone else and deserve the chance to learn and train at a sport that brings not only a sense of control and fitness but a sport that is playable by ALL, regardless their disability."

Golf for All

It is said that more business is done on the golf course than is done in the office –and no wonder. Golf is a true test of character, an escape, a source of rare joy and excruciating pain.

No psychological test will tell you as much about a person's character as a round of golf. All People who learn golf etiquette early on, start out one step above the rest. Let us bring golf to all people of all ages, regardless of ability, circumstance, or handicap.
